Once again, it is the time of year when so much Life departs, sinking back into the ground, flying away or sleeping deeply for the long winter. Our awareness of the cycle of life and death may be more conscious at this time of year (especially this year!). For we too are part of the natural cycle.

The playful silliness of Halloween is one response to our awareness of death. We drag out scary decor and prod the dark cobwebby corners of childhood fears. We domesticate ghosts and zombies and laugh at the fake graves. Don't misunderstand me: I love dressing in costumes! But Halloween's colourful distractions have pulled us away from more thoughtful reflections.

Halloween comes from All Hallows Eve. In older English usage, a "hallow" was a saint or holy person. And so, All Hallows Eve was before All Hallows Day, or as we call it, All Saints day (November 1). In the Celtic tradition this was "Samhain", and it marked the end of the harvest season and beginning of winter or the 'darker half' of the year. It was seen as a liminal time, when the boundary between this world and the Otherworld thinned. This was a time to remember the dead, including saints and martyrs and the "faithful departed". The Day of the Dead is an important tradition in some cultures.

The saints we remember are not only the declared saints of the gospel and the Roman Catholic pantheon. They are also the good, regular folks who laboured on, their quiet lives full of kindness, hard work and love. So, on November 1, let's pause to think of all the saints both major and minor who have gone before us, and of all the personal saints who have influenced and taught us.

For instance, apart from grandmothers, parents, professors and the obvious candidates, I recall an older woman in our church in Montreal. She was a delightful person, full of dry humour and gentleness. She had a strong moral compass and I learned from seeing her work for a more lively, authentic expression of our Christian faith at church. She and I used puppets to do the children's time of the worship service. She played the dignified, sympathetic "straight man" for the silly puppets I animated. I am so grateful for her companionship and wisdom as we studied, worked, and played together for years.

As All Saints Day approaches, let us think of the generations of people who's work we stand upon: the people who were martyrs for their faith and the people who knitted socks for the poor; the people who poured over texts and translations, and the people who built churches; the famous people of faith that are recorded in books, and the invisible believers who's individual stamp has blended into the sea of work done. People lived and loved, and then rejoined the earth like a brilliant autumn leaf.

So, think about your personal saints who have guided and inspired you through the years. There will be a Samhain service at Wesley on Sunday evening, November 1, where you can go deeper into this experience. And don't forget that you are probably a saint for someone in your life! Let us all be a light to each other!
